SYNOPSIS: In Missouri, college student Jason Collins is persuaded by his friend Craig to allow a shipment of drugs to be sent to his house. He signs for the package which contains pills and a tracking device. DEA officers break into the house; Jason flees but is chased down and arrested by Agent Cooper.

While at a barbecue, John Matthews, Jason's estranged father and owner of a construction company, is called by his ex-wife Sylvie about Jason's arrest. The ex-spouses meet with an investigator who explains Craig set Jason up to reduce his own sentence. Jason's charges carry a minimum of 10 years in prison, so he is pressured to inform on one of his own friends to reduce his own sentence. Jason is unable to do this, or unwilling.

Using his connections, John arranges to meet with local United States Attorney Joanne Keeghan, who is running an aggressive anti-drug campaign. Keeghan agrees to reduce Jason's sentence if John informs on a drug dealer. Cooper leads a task force which will monitor any dealings John arranges to use as evidence for an arrest.

John scours his employee records and finds that new employee Daniel James has two prior distribution convictions. Daniel is currently leading a clean life to avoid a third strike. John offers $20,000 if he simply introduces him to a dealer; Daniel agrees, though he is unaware that John is acting as an informant. Daniel introduces John to Malik, an extremely dangerous, high-ranking local drug dealer, who also has two strikes.

Saying that his construction business cannot stay afloat in the current economy without a supplement to its revenues, John offers to run nearly limitless amounts of drugs at almost zero risk in his freight trucks. Malik agrees under the condition that John and Daniel drive the initial run themselves.

John and Agent Cooper arrange for several wire taps. John drives to the pick-up point near the Mexican border. A rival gang ambushes the pick-up, but John escapes. This impresses cartel kingpin Pintera, whose men fight off the hijackers. John then makes the deal, delivering the drugs to Malik while under surveillance by Cooper. Malik mentions a meeting with cartel members above himself.

Hoping to catch the higher priority targets, Cooper does not move to arrest Malik as agreed. Keeghan insists Cooper did the right thing and reneges on her promise to reduce Jason's sentence unless John cooperates in the second meeting. Outraged, he demands that Jason be released when the job is completed.

Daniel learns of John's arrangement with the DEA and is furious, saying that the cartel will kill John, Daniel, and their families if they learn the truth. Both men send their families into hiding, then John meets with Pintera. He wants him to run nearly $100 million in drug profits into Mexico and offers to make John a member of the cartel's inner circle if he succeeds. Keeghan relishes the prospect of arresting such a high-profile dealer, but Cooper has a change of heart and tries to talk John out of doing the run, suspecting the cartel will kill him afterwards.

John devises a plan to free himself and Daniel from both the government and the cartel. During the run, he is able to escape Cooper's surveillance. At the same time, Daniel sneaks into Malik's house, killing his guards and mortally wounding him.

Before dying, Malik reveals Pintera's cell phone number to Daniel. John calls Cooper and has him track both his new cell phone and Pintera's phone, effectively giving Cooper both the money and the kingpin at once. The cartel realizes both that John's son is Jason and he is an informant which leads them on a highway chase and shootout before escaping.

The cartel members and the money are seized by Cooper's men. Pintera is surrounded by federal agents and surrenders because his young son is with him. John leaves a large federal reward check that he received for the capture of Pintera for Daniel. Jason is released, while John and his family go into the witness protection program.
